A number of years ago, Don Taylor left Oshkosh, Wisconsin, and did something that officials say constituted a record - a most unusual record. He completed a 23,000-mile trip around the world in an airplane he built himself!

Taylor's journey took sixty days, and he estimated that he spent more than eight hundred hours of that period in the plane itself. His longest continuous time in the air was ten hours, from Midway to the Aleutian Islands. The plane, which he called the "Victoria 76", had a wingspan of twenty one feet and an engine capable of developing 180 horsepower. This flight was not his first attempt. In 1974, he failed to circle the globe because of bad weather conditions over Japan.

Flying over the Iranian desert was one of his worst experiences - especially as he was forced to land and spend a night in a camel stable.
